Cycling BMX Freestyle

Overview

BMX has its roots in the racing culture that existed in California in the mid-1970s. Inspired by motocross riders, children tried to imitate their heroes by performing airborne tricks on their bikes. The sport has been transformed from grassroots and a “misfit” culture to a mainstream sport thanks to extensive television coverage which has made it recognisable around the world with World Championships now held annually.

At Tokyo 2020 Games, competitors will compete in the park discipline which sees riders execute tricks on obstacles such as walls, box jumps and spines. They are given 60 seconds to perform acrobatics tricks and skills, with tricks scored on multiple aspects including difficulty, originality, execution, height and creativity.

BMX freestyle will make its Olympic debut at Tokyo 2020, where it will bring a fresh, youthful feel to the Olympic programme.

Exciting tricks, originality and creativity

In Tokyo, there will be just nine men and nine women riders, with the host nation Japan taking one of those spots. Despite the event being one of the smallest at the Olympic Games,

Overview

Basketball is played by two teams of five players on a 28mx15m court with players looking to score by shooting the ball into a basket. A successful shot from outside the three-point line is awarded three points, a successful shot from inside the three-point line is two points and a successful free throw following a foul is one point. A highlight of the sport is the famous dunk which is made at the
